Iron spearhead with silver and copper decoration

Viking, late ()-10th century AD
London, ()

This large and elegant spearhead was found in the () Thames in 1848. It formed part of the collection of the pioneering () archaeologist Thomas ().

All free men in () society was entitled to own and carry weapons: spear heads are the most commonly found weapon of the Viking (). Although often discovered in graves, there is much discussion about why so many weapons from () period were lost or deliberately put into (), notably the Thames in the () area.

The () is slender and tapering, with a long socket. The socket is completely covered with rings of twisted silver, and () wires are inlaid into the iron surface in a herring-bone pattern. This decoration is typical of the craftsmanship of the Viking smiths in Norway. One substantial rivet attached the spear head to a long wooden shaft, making an effective weapon for both () and ().
